Society and historical change

Industrialisation changes patterns of work, residence and mobility. A theory linking families to society should explain how those connections vary over time.

Parsons' next question

Parsons developed an account of how the family fits industrial society. L008 will examine his argument and his emphasis on primary socialisation and the stabilisation of adult personalities.

Keep evaluation open

If another institution performs an activity, ask whether the family's contribution has disappeared, changed or become shared. A claim of a fit between institutions needs historical and comparative evidence.

F1

Why might industrialisation be relevant to an explanation of family life?

F2

Which two functions will Parsons' account emphasise?

F3

What evidence could test a proposed fit between families and society? Retrieve the four Murdock functions tomorrow and next week.
